THE END

POWDER HORN

On the surface everything looked peaceful at Brandon's Trading Post. There were four large covered wagons within the protection of the stockade. The oxen were outside grazing. Some of the children were even picking flowers. And here and there could be seen a squaw busy at work making moccasins. But inside the main hall a dispute was taking place. And Major John R. Kemp was doing his best not to lose his temper.

"If you leave today or tomorrow with those four wagons you will never reach Willows Creek," said the officer. "Somewhere out there on the plains is Philippe Batiste and his crew of cutthroats. They raid small wagon parties. And they are even worse than the hostile Indians. They won't leave a survivor. Only burnt wagons."

Back in New England they said that Henry Owens was as stubborn as a mule. Much better to try to talk to a hurricane than to reason with him once he had made up his mind.

"We got good guns," snapped back the New Englander. "And if it comes to fighting thieves then our women folks will give us a hand. They can reload the rifles. And even shoot if necessary. We are traveling on a schedule. Time is precious. Don't want to get caught in the winter snows."

There was but one last appeal and the Major decided to try it. He turned to the famous man of the west and spoke.

"Davy Crockett, see if you can pound some sense into his head. If he won't think of himself, then how about that little girl of his? Does he want to sacrifice little Frances also?"

Davy Crockett had met men like Henry Owens before and he would meet the same type again. It would be a waste of words to try to convince Henry Owens about the real danger out there on the plains. He had a different idea.

"He won't wait two days until the wagon train from St. Louis arrives. He could join them. So I say just let him go. No skin off our back."

The reply was so different than that which the Major had expected that surprise was written all over the officer's face. But he realized that Davy Crockett must have some plan. So he said nothing.

Outside the building, Davy Crockett Jr. was talking to Frances Owen who was interested in the famous son of a famous man.

"This is my powder horn," explained the young boy. "And this is my bullet pouch. I also have patches when I ram the ball down the barrel of my gun. Maybe my father will let me show you how I shoot."

Frances Owen took the horn, which was on a strap, from Davy, Jr. and examined it. Davy Crockett and his friend Jed Turner watched with interest.

"I see you are going to do nothing. Or maybe it is something," said Jed Turner with a smile playing over his lips. "I guess there is more than one way to handle a fool."

The next morning the small wagon party left. They had only travelled some five miles when they were overtaken by a half-dozen cavalry men under Sergeant Bellows.

"Anything wrong?" asked Henry Owens.

"Something has been stolen and we want you all to return to the trading post," replied Sergeant Bellows.

"You must be crazy," half shouted the angry Henry Owens. "Go ahead and search all the wagons. We are honest folks."

The sergeant accepted the invitation. He searched Henry Owens' wagon first and found the object. Holding up the powder horn he pointed to the name on it: Davy Crockett, Jr.

"You'll all have to return with us to the trading post and the Major will decide what to do."

In spite of protests, the wagons turned around and, accompanied by the soldiers, retraced their path. When they were inside the stockade, Henry Owens rushed up to Davy Crockett.

"I want to see the Major at once! This is an outrage. I don't know how that powder horn got into my wagon. My little girl says she didn't take it. You believe me, don't you?"

"Of course I do," replied Davy Crockett. "But the Major won't be back for two days. So you have no choice but to wait here. I am certain matters will be cleared up."

Two days later a very sympathetic Major John R. Kemp turned up at the trading post. But so did ten wagons from St. Louis. There should have been twenty. Dan Lowell gave an explanation.

"We argued what route to take. So we split up. Half of the wagons took the southern route. We figured too many Indians that way."

The four wagons of Henry Owens joined the other ten when they left the trading post. It was felt that this group would be a match for Philippe Batiste and his men, should they try an attack. The first night away from the trading post every precaution was taken against a surprise attack. The wagons were formed into a circle with the tongue of one wagon right into the rear axle of the wagon in front. Most of the livestock was kept inside the corral. Men were posted on two-hour guard breaks. But nothing happened except that one little fact puzzled the rather observant Henry Owens.

"Something funny about the last wagon," he remarked to his wife. "Folks in it don't come out at all. And they have an old man driving. Maybe they have a lot of valuables with them and don't trust anybody."

In the afternoon they stopped at a creek. From behind a thick clump of bushes they were observed by Mike Waver, a spy of Philippe Batiste.

"Ride back to camp and tell Philippe there are but fourteen wagons. If we attack them when the sun is with us, they will find it difficult to shoot. We can stampede their stock. Then the rest will be easy," said Mike Waver to Ben Gordon who was at his side. "I will remain here and watch every movement they make."

An hour's hard riding brought the outlaw to his leader's secret hideaway. He delivered the message to a man with a long black beard.

"We use the same plan we did last month," explained Philippe Batiste. "Ten of you will dress as redskins and shoot fire arrows into the wagons. Then ten of you will stampede the animals. I will lead the rest of our men in a charge. There must be no survivors. I will make my name the terror of the West."

It was late in the afternoon and yet the blazing sun in all her glory showered her powerful rays against the wagons that still were at rest. It seems that the last wagon had to remain in one place because of a damaged axle.

"Why can't we go ahead and the wagon will catch up with us later?" protested Henry Owens.

"Because it is the unwritten law of the West that we stick together no matter how long we are delayed," replied Dan Lowell.

No sooner than he had finished those words when a cloud of dust appeared on the horizon. It was the main group of Philippe Batiste's men riding hard towards the wagon. Suddenly rifle fire broke out from behind the clump of bushes where several of the outlaws managed to creep up unobserved.

"Lock the wagons together," shouted Dan Lowell. "Get the stock inside the corral or they will stampede our animals."

One wagon did not move. As the group dressed as Indians headed for it, something strange happened. Down went the side. Eight men in it aimed their rifles and fired. Each bullet found a mark and there were eight riderless horses. There was no need to reload. For each man had at his side three other loaded rifles. And one of those "men" was Davy Crockett, Jr. himself, in between his father and Jed Turner.

Philippe Batiste was no coward. He and some of his men headed for that wagon, the rest fled. The attack was over. It had been a surprise, but not as planned.

"Davy Crockett, you were here all the time," shouted Henry Owens with joy as he also saw Davy Crockett, Jr., Jed Turner, Sergeant Bellows, the Major, and several other crackshots.

"You would have gone to your doom," said Davy Crockett, "had your four wagons been out here alone. I convinced the Major to set a trap and get rid of the outlaws. Philippe Batiste is alive and we'll take him back with us."

Before they parted, Davy Crockett Jr. handed Frances his powder horn.

"You can remember me and my father by this gift," he said simply.

"You actually hid that horn in my wagon the first time, to keep us from being killed," interrupted Henry Owens. "We will remember what you did for us the rest of our lives."

Famous Battles Of History

General Custer ★★

IT WAS ON THE MORNING OF JUNE 25, 1876, GENERAL CUSTER AND HIS FAMOUS 7TH REGIMENT SET OUT TO DESTROY THE POWERFUL SIOUX AND CHEYENNE NATION.

WITHIN SIGHT OF THE INDIAN CAMP HE SENT OUT ABOUT A HUNDRED TROOPERS TO ENGAGE THE INDIANS AT ONE END OF THEIR CAMP. BEFORE THE TROOPS COULD REACH THEM, THE INDIANS POURED THOUSANDS OF ROUNDS OF BULLETS

Sitting Bull

INTO THEM. IN A MATTER OF A FEW MINUTES 29 SOLDIERS WERE KILLED AND MANY WOUNDED.

SOLDIERS ALSO ATTACKED THE OTHER END OF CAMP BUT WERE ALSO DRIVEN OFF THE TIME HAD COME FOR THE INDIANS TO STRIKE.

THEY FORDED THE RIVER AND TRAPPED CUSTER FROM ALL SIDES. THE GENERAL AND HIS MEN PUT UP A BRAVE FIGHT, BUT THE INDIANS WERE MANY, SOLDIERS FEW. IN A SHORT TIME OVER 300 TROOPERS HAD BEEN KILLED OR WOUNDED, AMONG THE MANY DEAD WAS GEN. CUSTER, THE MAN WHO SWORE TO CRUSH THE SIOUX AND CHEYENNE NATION.
